

NAME _____

- T F 1. The abstract of an APA-style manuscript can, if necessary, introduce concepts not found in the body of the paper.
- T F 2. When typing an APA-style manuscript, each line should not exceed 6.5 inches.
- T F 3. Like the introduction, the discussion section follows a general-to-specific format.
- T F 4. Standard, commercially available laboratory equipment should be described in minute detail in the apparatus section.
- T F 5. The title page of an APA-style manuscript is the only page on which your name appears.
- T F 6. Biased language in writing is usually limited to sexist language.
- T F 7. Using extensive quotes from other sources, even if correctly cited, constitutes lazy writing.
- T F 8. It is generally not necessary to include details in a method section.
- T F 9. Biased language can be reduced by paying special attention to labels assigned to people.
- T F 10. The introduction to an APA-style manuscript describing an experiment must contain an exhaustive literature review.
- T F 11. Figures and tables are usually used to display information too complex to be adequately described in the text.
- T F 12. Failure to cite the source when using another person's words and ideas in a paper constitutes plagiarism.
- T F 13. The general format of an introduction to an APA-style manuscript flows from a general discussion to specifics.
- T F 14. Poster sessions allow you to interact meaningfully with other researchers.
- T F 15. All articles you read, whether or not they are mentioned in the paper, should be listed in the reference section.
- T F 16. You are usually given 15 minutes to present a paper during an oral presentation at a professional conference.
- T F 17. In an oral presentation, it is a good idea to describe all the details about the subjects and apparatus used in your research.
- T F 18. It is acceptable to speculate on the importance of your results in the discussion section, as long as you do not stray too far from your data.
- T F 19. All journals that publish psychological research adhere strictly to APA writing style.
- T F 20. The abstract of a theoretical paper should be between 75 and 100 words.